Chapter 1 by intellikat

There is a rumour floating about that including pigeons in one's story will make it a high scorer.

Chapter 2 by Comp Som "CS" Anichi

Although this reader doubts this claim, since they have not seen any pigeons in any stories.

There was a Corn on a Unicycle,

There was a cookie man

There was a man who had become leader of the galaxy despite having HIV

There was an eccentric boss (emphasis on the was; there is still no replacement to this day)

There was The Daily News

There were many unsolved murders

There were mysterious sticky notes

Although, now this reader realized that-

"I haven't actually checked how much points the stories I read have."

Oops.

This reader just realized this after writing so much. It'll be a waste not to post this. This reader is now embarrassed with their rambling.

Chapter 3 by lysander

Despite careful inspection of the cold, hard facts and numerous blind-tests done by a bunch of old white people in lab coats, the jury was still out. The results were far too inconclusive to hold any sway with the public, and even less so the sponsors who funded all the research. Pigeons, contrary to popular belief, did not guarantee story quality or success. In fact, only about 2% of examined best-sellers even mentioned them.

It seemed that project B.I.R.B (Beneficial Inclusion of Random Bullshit) was back to the drawing board. Now, the problem was not the question of pigeons, but of pay. Time was money, a whole lot of it was swirling down the drain with every passing second, much like the putrid lumps of bird crap washing down the laboratory sinks at this very moment.

Task: Impress the board of education again. Do something real fancy, get a grant, then hole up more old white people in lab coats (with degrees) in one of those ivy-league schools so they can abuse their facilities in the name of M.E.M.E.S (Mandatory Evaluation of Mankind's Evolutionary Status).

Their target this time: Harvard university. Apparently Obama's kid's attending next year. What a time to be alive. One lab technician they hired mused about pulling some strings, getting an autograph for their kid.

You happen to be that lab technician.

So, revised task: Impress the board of education, not Obama to sign your lab visitor. It was going to be a good day today.
